

Roman Procyk is Executive Director and Manager of the Ukrainian Studies Fund, a New York-based public charity that funds educational endeavors in Ukrainian Studies, including teaching and research programs at major North American universities. He began as a volunteer and advanced to oversee some of the Fund's key projects, including efforts to fund Ukrainian studies at Harvard University and the establishment of the Great Famine Research Project—an initiative that led to publication of Robert Conquest's landmark study in 1986 and more recently Anne Applebaum's monograph "Red Famine" in 2017. In 2002, Roman Procyk chaired the fundraising campaign that successfully expanded the financial base of the Ukrainian Studies Program at Columbia University, a multi-year initiative that led to the creation of a string of new endowed funds at Columbia. Roman Procyk holds a doctorate in Biochemistry and was a research associate at the New York Blood Center and a Senior Research Investigator at Bristol-Myers Squibb.
