

Nathan Goldstone is a Postdoctoral Research Scholar at Columbia's Harriman Institute. His dissertation, "Reframing Russophobia: Reflections of Nation, Land, and Self," explores how Russian-language cultural production has participated in the development and redefinition of post-Soviet national identity in several cultural spaces in Central Asia, Eastern Europe, and the South Caucasus. His scholarly interests include ecocritical and anti-nuclear narratives as well as cultural responses to Perestroika. His work has appeared most recently in the Oxford Handbook for the Russian Novel.
