

Adam E. Leeds is Assistant Professor of Slavic Languages and Cultures at Columbia University. He is broadly concerned with the formation and repeated redaction of political "modernity," especially the intertwined advent of liberalism, socialism, and political economy, and the way that the Cold War shaped historical consciousness of all of the above. His work disturbs the ideological closures of the Cold War by challenging its pathologizing narratives of the socialist movement and the Soviet experience. His most recent article, "Marxism's Transformation into a Statism, 1876-1936: 'State Socialism, 'State Capitalism, 'War Communism'," is forthcoming in The Journal of Modern History, and he is completing a manuscript provisionally entitled Scientific Socialism: Cold War Modernity, Political Epistemology, and Economic Theory in the Soviet Union.
